Comments concerning draft rulemakings

New draft rules are a step in the right direction, but remain woefully inadequate to protect our communities. Limiting notification only to direct neighbors fails to take into consideration the myriad and often widespread environmental effects. Limiting input to only those who can prove direct harm also fails to take into consideration the complex, diverse, and widespread effects, as well as violating the speech of those indirectly affected, those without resources to prove direct harm, especially in such a short time frame, and allies. Allowing alternative disposal options is good for innovation, but exempting those options from the rules is unacceptable and dangerous. Mechanisms for oversight and penalties must be strengthened. It is time for new regulations, but let's do this right.
