Comments concerning proposed rulemakings

Reading through the proposed language the emphasis appears to be limited to electricity generating utilities. While generating electricity is a high priority the individual consumer should also benefit from the weather protections. Many homes and businesses in Texas are heated with natural gas. If gas supply were lost in winter, those homes and businesses would be severely affected. Additionally, due to the weak infrastructure of the Texas electric grid, many homes and businesses now have standby generators powered by natural gas. A loss of gas to those generators during an electric power outage would also be devastating. These proposed regulations should protect everyone, including the local customers.
